Continue to seek opportunities that will allow the Bureau to improve the effectiveness to expand the involvement of operationally sound conditions and create a supportive environment for activities and skills development of the services provided to promote the reintegration of inmates with serious or chronic medical problems, or the containment of extremely violent or escape-prone inmates.

The Federal Bureau of Prisons (FBOP) incarcerates 153,248 federal prisoners across 37 states. FBOP inmates are housed in 127 stand-alone U.S. federal prisons, 68 satellite camps, and 12 private facilities. The FBOP oversees the functioning of these facilities to provide inmates with access to programs for education and work, including preparation for reentry into society.

The FBOP is headed by the director, then the deputy director. They are responsible for programmatic oversight and direction of the FBOP’s mission. The FBOP manages federal prisons in the following regions:

- Northeast Region
- North Central Region
- Mid-Atlantic Region
- Western Region

The FBOP has five main divisions:

1. Management Division
2. Human Resource Division
3. OIC of General Counsel
4. Information, Policy & Public Affairs Division
5. Health Services Division

The Federal Prison Systems Division is responsible for the day-to-day operations of the FBOP. The Reentry Services Division is responsible for the successful reintegration of inmates back into society. The Industries Division provides job training and placement assistance to inmates. The Correctional National Institute of Programs Division is responsible for the development and delivery of programs and services for inmates.

Learn More About the FBOP

Our team of expert prison consultants can help you serve the least amount of time in the best federal prison, with the earliest opportunity for release.

Contact us for a free initial consultation.